QUESTION 2 TEXTUAL SOURCE ANALYSIS

This is an extract from a memorandum sent by Nelson Mandela to FW de Klerk on 26 June 1992.

Our country is on the brink of a disaster. First there is the crisis in the negotiation process itself. The central blockage stems from the refusal of the NP government to move together with all of us in the process of truly democratising South Africa.

Secondly, the continuing direct and indirect involvement of the NP government, the state security forces and the police in the violence as well as your unwillingness to act decisively* to bring such violence to an end have created an untenable* and explosive situation.

The NP government persists in portraying the crisis as a creation of the ANC. This attitude is unhelpful and extremely dangerous. The NP government is placing party political interests above national interests by trying to minimise the seriousness of this crisis.

There is only one way forward. It is a road which must unmistakably and unequivocally* lead to the establishment of a democratic South Africa.

QUESTION 3 CURRENT ISSUE IN THE MEDIA

This is an extract from an article published by historian Anne Heffernan on 15 June 2016 on the online South African academic website, The Conversation.

Strategic lessons South Africa's students can learn from the leaders of 1976

This month forty years ago, thousands of Soweto schoolchildren took to the streets to protest the racism and inadequacy of Bantu Education. That moment has come to symbolise the role that young people have played and can play in shaping South Africa's political discourse*. It remains a touch point for student activists today ... The marches in June 1976 took shape around a unifying issue of immediate importance to the students: the imposition of Afrikaans as a teaching medium in black classrooms, whose curriculum was dictated by the then Department of Bantu Education. (Paragraph 1)

... Forty years later South Africa is again in the midst of a political movement led by students – this time on university campuses across the country. Today's student activists are often compared to the generation of 1976. In mass marches through Johannesburg and Pretoria the form of their protest has prompted the comparison ... In their articulation* of ideologies like Black Consciousness they echo some of the key thinkers of that period. But their protests remain largely constrained* by the campuses on which they happen ... University students of 2015–16 have some key things in common with their 1976 predecessors*. They have changed the tenor* and shape of political discussion around education in South Africa more effectively than any other single movement since 1994. They have re-interrogated the ideologies that animated* students in 1976. Their engagement with Black Consciousness and Biko ... has led to a movement to decolonise universities' faculty and curricula. (Paragraph 2)

But today's students have struggled to move their activism beyond universities. Notwithstanding significant gains in the movement to end the exploitative practice of outsourcing* jobs on campuses, for which the movements of 2015–16 deserve a great deal of credit, student movements today have yet to create enduring alliances with workers outside the university, or with school students. Beyond shared ideology, the 1976 generation and, perhaps even more so, the university students of the early 1970s who taught and inspired them, may offer some strategic lessons. (Paragraph 3)
